DeSacre!

Pussy Riot meets Vaslav Nijinsky

The complexity of an artistic action is high, also or even more so, when it lasts only for forty seconds. A work of art appearing at the right moment may well touch the nerve of a society and hit a crucial point. In DeSacre! choreographer Christine Gaigg juxtaposes the art scandal around Pussy Riot on February 21, 2012, with scenes from Igor Strawinsky’s and Vaslav Nijinsky’s 'Le Sacre du Printemps' which caused a scandal at its premiere in 1913.

The encounter of both works of art throws a light on their respective motives as well as on the implications for society. In the form of a documentary performance DeSacre! suggests how the hundred year old choreography of Nijinsky may comment on the punk art of Pussy Riot.

Christine Gaigg conceived DeSacre! in April 2013 on invitation by the Office of The Federal President of Austria and Tanzquartier Wien to create a performance for the Viennese Josephskapelle, a small catholic church built for the imperial Habsburg family in the 18th century.

The issues raised by DeSacre! also pose questions to our contemporary society: What is desecration? Do values considered sacrosanct already explain the scandal? How does Pussy Riot’s action exceed pure provocation?

Press reviews

“The choreographer did nor merely reconstruct Nijinsky’s work but has reinforced the lost choreography with a current, explosive topic and therefore a new language. That is a real achievement.”

Der Standard

“An insistent, intelligent evening, which does not convey itself immediately but unfolds progressively in the mind of the spectator.”

tanz

“Because of the dancers’ precision, exact timing and minimal use of props, effectively an idea of gestural language, common to political as well es aesthetic protest, emerges.”

Pussy Riot meets Vaslav Nijinsky

Pussy Riot in the Christ the Saviour Church in Moscow is an example of an extreme clash of means of expression and communication. The narrative started with the live art act in the church, went into the immediate release of the music video clip on the internet, from there to diverse media reports by state and church via the classic media channels like TV; the narrative includes artistic international support, local people demonstrating for and against Pussy Riot during the court case, the court case which led to two years in prison for two band members, which ended with a two months early release through annulation, after the release it continues with Pussy Riot’s engagement in new areas.

The Pussy Riot members are a generation who use social media and the internet – the fact that they are fluent in internet iconography makes them suspicious for a big other part of the Russian society - at the same time they understand themselves as punks and as conceptual artists who know how to choose the right time and the right place for an artistic action.

DeSacre! is a performance concept as meta-framework: art explains art. The centre of the piece is the re-enactment and video-analysis of Pussy Riot’s act in the church in order to lay open that it makes a difference in the legal evaluation to look at the live performance instead of the media event. DeSacre! gives the audience the possibility to fully experience the action in the sort of location for which it was designed: in a church. DeSacre! delivers a dialectical examination of the Pussy Riot case with the help of of Nijinsky’s “Le Sacre du Printemps” and spans a historical thread of hundred years of avantgarde art, from the affront towards a ballet audience to the global media event of nowadays’ societies.
